POETS FOR CORBYN
EDITED BY RUSSELL BENNETTS
CONTENTS

Wongawongaland 2
  Tom Pickard

For Jeremy Corbyn 3
  Michael Rosen

Scarlet Macaws 4
  Pascale Petit

The Seven Ages of a Labour MP 6
  Ian Birchall

Until I Built the Wall 7
  Michael Schmidt

The Red Road 9
  Marion McCready

For the Love of God 10
  Nick Telfer

Anderby Creek 11
  Rory Waterman

Doll Hospital at the Top of the Hill 12
  Helen Ivory

COMMA 13
  Iain Galbraith

Unelectable 14
  Andy Jackson

J.C. 15
  Nicholas Murray

from ‘a better tale to tell’
composed from submissions to The Smith Commission 17
  Alec Finlay
Growing Fears That the Leadership Contest Has Been Hijacked by Far-Left Infiltrators
Erik Kennedy

The Spiders
(A New Labour Fallacy)
Ian Pindar

Austerity
Becky Cherriman

Coat
Josephine Corcoran

8th May song
Natalie Chin

Corbyn
Ernest Schonfield

Poem of Philosophical and Parental Conundrums
Written In An Election Year
Erin Belieu

About the Authors
Poets For Corbyn
Wongawongaland

Tom Pickard

Doctor Gobbles wants to stop the jobless quaffing from his gissy goblets and break their backs on the rock of his salvation.

He serves a cold buffet of hot wars to pump-up the economy for further plunder and squanders young lives like bankers on a junket.

If he hung the hungry he'd hang the anger out, incentivise to fuck off and die or just have a jousting match of polite poetries.

Once they bled themselves for a cure now they only bleed the poor
For Jeremy Corbyn

Michael Rosen

Fresh from:
proclaiming the virtues of the 1000 year dynasty, the British monarchy;

advising us of the special qualities of a non-elected second chamber with its origins in Norman rule;

celebrating an economic system that was developed and finessed with the use of child labour around 1810;

continuing to solve international disputes with the 10,000 year old method of killing those you disagree with;

they tell us that socialism is outdated.
Scarlet Macaws

Pascale Petit

The scarlet macaws want their red back, not puce or pink but rich rubescence.
They squawk and screech and growl for the people to give it back.

They want their green and yellow, the ultramarine and azure of their flight feathers.
They want their green homes to vibrate against their red plumage.

They don’t want to be eaten.
They don’t want to be sacrificed.
They don’t want to be shot for their celestial light and lose their teeth and eyes.
They don’t want to be called Seven Macaw and mark the coming of the dry season or the hurricane season.

They don’t want to be shot from the world tree
by the Hero Twins
or be worn by them in a victory headdress.
They don’t want to be bred as pets or for trade.

They want to spread their feathers like the world’s riches, a currency that doesn’t cost a thing, that doesn’t symbolise blood.
They don’t want their heads chopped off and stuck on poles in city temples.

They say their scarlet hue is life.
They say that every tree is an axis mundi and all their eyes are suns.
They don’t want their heads stuck on grey human bodies for funeral rites.
They don’t want their ashes to treat diseases because no medicine is left, no doctor.

They want to take their place with the quetzal and the jaguar.
Their feathers are axes,
their feathers are lightning,
their feathers are rain

for everyone, not just the rulers with their royal aviaries.
Sun-macaws are free,
they are prayer-arrows,
Morning Stars,
they are the west wind that brings change.
They are the cardinal directions of health.

Do not bury them in human graves.
Do not bury them as plucked grave-goods until the country is just a naked carcass with its feet and wings bound tight around its heart.
The Seven Ages of a Labour MP

Ian Birchall

At first the student,
Posing and strutting in the NUS.
Then the droning speaker, with his briefcase
And shining Sunday suit, creeping to his Selection Committee. And then the loyalist,
Lying like trooper, with a woeful tirade
Made to his Leader’s buttocks. Then an MP,
Full of strange terms, reading from autocue,
Lacking all honour, shallow and slick in quarrel,
Seeking the bubble reputation,
Ever in the camera’s eye. And then the minister,
In fair round belly with free dinners lined,
Eyes insincere and clothes of formal cut,
Full of cheap lies and dodgy evasions;
And so he makes his pile. The sixth age shifts
Into the mean and cliché’d veteran,
With spectacles on nose and perks on side;
His youthful hopes, long lost, are far too wide
For his shrunk mind; and his big manly voice,
Turning again toward childish platitudes,
Repeats the old slogans. Last scene of all,
That ends this uneventful history,
Is Second Chamber, full of mere oblivion,
Sans teeth, sans brain, sans guts, sans principles.
Until I Built the Wall

Michael Schmidt

Until I built the wall they did not find me.
Sweet anarchy! attending quietly
To wild birds or picking the blackberry.

Trespassers did not know they erred and came
In and away, leaving the land the same.
The hunter went to richer ground for game.

Tending, profitless, my property
Which no map mentioned, where no metal lay
In veins beneath the surface of hard clay

And bristle grass, I watched my livestock -- scores
Of lizards, armadillos, and the birds --
Free citizens. I had concealed no snares.

Mere ground. Mere nothing harvested or sown.
But how the shadows made the rough design
Live as a landscape for the man alone!

So I grew proud. That's why I built the wall
Of stone and mortar, and I drove a nail
Into a stake and hung a sign to tell

The wanderer Private Land, with guarantees
Of instant death for anyone who tries To enter here: leave hope. Vain promises!

Who would I kill or could I kill?
Before I turned a servant of the will
To mark my ground, indeed, who would I hurt or kill?

Now peering from the rim of my high wall
I see the plain outside abruptly shrill
With enemies I do not know. They call Who's in there, what do you mean, and why?
I hold my peace, but they've discovered me
Because I drew a line, a Here am I.

They rob my peace, they take away my sleep.
Their voices drizzle all the night. I step Along the wall as round a castle keep

Till in the daylight there they stand again,
Drawn up from their shadows till at noon
Ghost warriors hover by the place I own.

As ribs around a heart, the gentle wall
Tucks in the land, or as a crisp snail shell Cups its soft cause. Yet yearlong vigil

Sours memory of the lovely ground,
Rivets to masonry the heart and hand:
I tend a straitened altitude of stone.
The morning scent of spring colours the sky
above the Red Road.

Son,
close your eyes.

Swallow this bitter butterfly,
let its wings expand in your throat (as we tie ourselves together with rope).

Mother, father,
at cloud-height,
the clouds form crosses in the sky.

Son,
come.
God will catch us.

The frost-thumbed grass will cry
with our broken bones alone (the furniture of our souls),

for we are citizens of the sky.
For the Love of God

Nick Telfer

NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO
BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO
BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO
BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR NO BLAIR
Anderby Creek

Rory Waterman

for Ian Parks

I went east by south-east to the place, found everything was there just as they’d said:
the one road leading out and leading in: an empty beach-house, brittle dunes, a few groynes sloping down into the sea.

  _Ian Parks, ‘Anderby Creek’_

I heard you read this tonight in central Leicester in a strip-lit hall as phosphorescence swelled unseen along that coast, dimly glittering, and slathering the groynes. Clench your eyes and gaze distantly through the lids: it swims like that.
The hills and tight walls of your Yorkshire mining town can recede beyond distance.

  _I [...] tried to find the reason why I came._

Did it help that nothing is here?
The pub stays bolted; Skegness isn’t so far but barely smudges the night. The stars are sharp.
The place won’t care if you come back. Come back.
Watch patternless algae thrash against that dark, creating what a flailing thought makes there – like your father lowering swiftly through the bedrock.
Doll Hospital at the Top of the Hill

Helen Ivory

Take her to the doll hospital;
restring the limbs with slipknots fill the skull with lint clean out the craze lines on her face and paint on a 1940s smile.

If this model has a welded voicebox
the upset might have rend it mute or misfired its mechanism in some way.
This type of fixing is too complex to execute.

Fill in the forms for discharge now,
wheel her all the way to the door.
When you release the handles Newton’s Theory of Gravity jumps in.
Now Repeat.
Something is growing into Mantree’s head, it could be a twig-like horn, a short piece of rope or a spine for all he cares he has forgotten its name straight away.
But this has happened before.
He remembers the moment an idea rooted snaking its way through his muddy morning

it unnerved him with curves, inlets, bays and a pine-tipped promontory.
The waves were leaping against his walls
they covered practically everything:

it seems this place is no longer what it was and you, my dear, have changed but all of us were always already changing. We were loving each other and becoming ever newer in a field that retained its ghosts in passing a blue sky, old currencies, suspended relative clauses
your first spring tide
the earliest version of a saucer

that brief intake of breath when we lifted a stone on the beach and an elver scribbled away

side-winding
Unelectable

Andy Jackson

You recall that all-night sitting? We were dead before our time, saw ourselves phased out within five years. I know that you were swayed by other manifestos, dandled by their spin at night and, in searching for a soul, this house divided. They will tell you I’m a bullet to the party’s head, a prophet who brings forth not honey but a drought, forgetting how I stood to rage at laws not made so much as meted out in strokes of black and white.

I have not simply come to sweep prevaricants away, but to reclaim the unequivocal reply. The books from which we sprang have all been bowdlerised, the songs we sang together have been taken off the playlist. Acts of faith have been repealed. I represent the things you want but cannot say, the ideology of why the hell not; socialism redux, neither new nor old, not clean or compromised but human to its heart, and that could be enough.
Like sheep who’ve scattered to the field’s high corner, the commentariat – now hunted fauna – together cling.
The practised put-downs, and the usual sneers, predictable pandering to baser fears,
the lazy tricks that served for years
no longer sing.

Pundits and pollsters, penny-a-liners,
effortless liars and maligners,
pieces pitched,
to Guardian or 4 no longer hack it.
The zeitgeist’s moved; they can no longer track it and there’s a note inside the salary packet:
you’re ditched!

Chancellor Osborne’s undeterred, and gives his underlings the word:
attack!
Class-warrior of an antique kind he makes his colleagues of one mind to hound the workers from behind.
A pack
of snapping Tory dogs
emerging from the autumn fogs exult.
The ‘enemy within’ attracts their curses (that’s dinner ladies, carers, nurses who learn there’s little in their purses).
It’s the cult of settling scores, unleashing dogs of war (though strikes are fewer than before).

They winch
their arses to the saddle, salivating, excited by the prey that’s waiting,
eased by commentators’ Left-baiting:
  a cinch.

Their anti-union bill’s revealed, and like a rotten fruit when peeled it’s vile inside: more harsh than any iron regime has yet to implement, or even dream, where strikers must declare the theme of any Tweet
before releasing it or face a fine or gaol:
that’s Britain now where oppositions fail to fight.
Until J.C. discovers that the old and young are eager to bite back, give tongue to protest, scrap the song that’s sung stage Right.

Its mandate twenty five per cent of votes,
the Government each day emotes:
  ‘Reform!’
until our ears become resistant to the sound, detect the lie that is its constant ground, refuse the claim that they have found a ‘norm’.

Corbyn’s no knight in shining vest,
or bright Messiah from the West (he’d say) but someone who has found a way to voice
a fractured country’s need for choice, to say we’ll make another kind of noise:
  No way!
from ‘a better tale to tell’
composed from submissions to The Smith Commission

Alec Finlay

Federalism raises the problem of what to do in England

there seems little appetite to recreate

Wessex
Mercia
Northumbria

as states of the union

a new English parliament is a necessity whether the English want it or not here’s a radical solution which may satisfy ALL parties Yes & No

a new Union (or perhaps Federation)

but ‘Union’ has a certain ring to it

England and Scotland momentarily leave the current Union
as independent countries

but join (as independent countries)

with all others in the wider British Isles

in a new trading entity

with common currency (let’s say the Pound)

with a common defence policy
  foreign policy

in a mutual partnership

  I think Wales would like that it may need England to be persuaded

  we could all be one ‘band of brothers
  on this Sceptered isle?’

  (what is to complain about that?)
Growing Fears That the Leadership Contest Has Been Hijacked by Far-Left Infiltrators

Erik Kennedy

If you think that spiny lobsters should own
the spiny lobster migration paths and not some groaning sea-god who licenses his image for use in tuna ads and myths, and if you believe a turtle shell with dozens of turtles trying to get in, crying ‘We’re all in it together,’ is what the world will look like in about 2029,

and if the chambered nautilus
to you represents a way of coping with a repeated loss of home instead of a ropey scheme for having loads of extra bedrooms,

and if in your entire life you’ve had no-one to identify with who wasn’t first and last a danger to the good through well-meaning compromise,

if you can agree to this,
resignedly but definitely,
you might be a socialist.
The Spiders
(A New Labour Fallacy)

Ian Pindar

The government here is largely made up of spiders. They don’t like us.

They tell us how lucky we are to be ruled over by spiders

and how our enemies
are envious.

Only spiders
are rewarded with high positions

so we all want to be spiders if it means getting on.

We don’t like spiders
but we’re resigned to becoming spiders

if that’s what it takes to defeat
the spiders.
Austerity

Becky Cherriman

Hear it scutter
along the guttering of offices,
in the bins behind Waitrose, the thorned bushes at the playground’s edge – a language devised by the high-born to parch the lips of those with less.

Live here too long and it will shudder down your throat like flu.
You will wake one morning aching with it, all other tongues you know forgotten –
the vernacular of the workers, lexicons of children with little,
dialects of kindness,
the diction of being human.
Coat

Josephine Corcoran

after Edip Cansever

A woman filled with the gladness of living refused to be suspicious of hope.

She was weary with the gloom of her coat and she emptied its pockets of cynicism.

She took out timidity.
She took out pessimism.

She took out scaremongering and put in honesty.

She took out the fear of being misinterpreted and put in the gift of saying what she believed in.

She took out the analysis of opinion polls and put in compassion.

On the street, other people admired her coat.
“‘That’s what I call a coat!’ they said and helped her to fill its pockets.

The giving up of seats on buses they put there,
the opening of doors and impossible jars,
the carrying of baby buggies up flights of stairs.

They put compliments into the pockets,
they put in favours, encouragement, patience, tolerance and understanding.

The sharing of belongings they put there and the sharing of ideas. The lending of things:
clothes, make-up, books, tea, coffee, milk, sugar
– so much lending! And no guarantees of repayment!
Deep inside the coat,
the woman held on to the goodness of people.

Winter was coming and the coat was keeping her warm.
The woman kept piling things into the pockets.
eyes refreshing screen at 7am as another wave of paper boats float in from the distance, towards the shoreline of meshed fingers tirelessly unfolding all night that which already bears the weight of the morning news

now all you can think of is how as a child you knew to pray when you were afraid that no one was coming home before dark lines fall and fences rise everyone is a stranger again it doesn’t matter if you’re [ ____ ] if your loyalties have been carved up as if all equally immutable as if you’ve given up your agency

as if the dead have said:
‘yes, it’s true—the place I was born was the only place that could ever anchor me back to shore’

so the day’s warmth comes forth black oil rippling through river maybe this is what it means when sometimes it has to close before it opens and yet who has won and at what cost

on one hand so tempted by the slip towards the exit sign on the other I have this burning torch
I hold before the Thames and this terrifying unfinished anger
Corbyn
Ernest Schonfield

They call you mad
Because you don’t suck up to bankers
They call you sick
Because you believe in fair play
They call you a wrecker
Because you want to build hospitals
They call you economically incompetent
When they have sold the nation’s assets at a loss.
They say you can never win.
You say, we’ll see.
My friend Barry joined Labour.
The website asked:
Why are you joining Labour?
He typed back:
So I can vote for Corbyn
Because I’m sick of New Labour bullshit and I can’t wait to see the look on war criminal Tony Blair’s face when they elect a decent man of principle and integrity
rather than some Tory-lite twat!
Poem of Philosophical and Parental Conundrums Written In An Election Year

Erin Belieu

From the backseat, Jude saying, Mama, I HATE Republicans, and the way he says HATE, saying it the way only a seven-year-old can, saying it like he’s very, very certain, is plenty disturbing since I’ve never once heard the word HATE come out of his mouth until this morning. And there are those who may be reading this poem, those people without children, or those, I should say, who choose not to have children, you might be impatient now that Jude has appeared here to make his meaningful pronouncement, and I get how tedious it is, listening to those who choose to have children drone on about the stupidity of standardized tests and the difficulty in finding authentically organic apple juice; but I beg your patience and ask you to imagine how unnerving it is to be responsible for these weird beings who rarely do anything you’d expected when you were reading What to Expect When You’re Expecting;
how we’re suckered into thinking this kid stuff is a science when really it’s the most abstract art form, like you’re standing in a gallery at MoMA, staring at an aquarium in which float three basketballs, and the piece is titled Aquarium with Three Basketballs, and you’re looking at others in the gallery considering the basketballs and they don’t look as if they’re having some cross-eyed internal struggle, and you’re sweating a little and embarrassed, thinking, There’s a message here that I’m not getting,

which is what I feel like, often, to have a child, and what I ponder in this moment; whether I’ve blown it again, as Jude, nicknamed by his teachers

“The Radiating Joy Machine,” boy of peculiar light and unusual kindness, has arrived this morning in the backseat of the car, belting out the word HATE and sounding like he absolutely means it.

And there are more practical difficulties beyond what could be viewed as the self-indulgently philosophical, such as Jude’s father, my ex-husband, who’s given me a speech the day before about not pushing our politics on Jude and letting him make up his own mind when he’s old enough to understand the complexities of the issues.

And, on principle, surely, I agree, though I know another factor must be that Jude’s father is now married to a woman who’s half Cuban and from Miami, who’s not thrilled with Jude piping up about republicans and booing every time a GOP candidate appears on TV.

And that’s what you call the realpolitik in action when it comes to divorce, wherein the rubber hits the “blended” family’s road. But since I’m not half Cuban and not from Miami, I don’t pretend I can speak to the cultural pressure and loyalties of the single-issue voter, though secretly I want to say to my ex-husband, the die-hardest of liberals – something I’ll always love about him – I want to say,

Really? When your beloved aunt is gay, as is my brother, whose husband is a political exile from Colombia? When Jude has a medical issue that might someday be cured by stem cell therapy, as insurance drains our paychecks every month while refusing to pay for a single, useful thing?

Really? But deep down, I know he’s right. If Jude has come to HATE, it’s probably come through me, even though I try so hard to love the sinner even when the sin is the most fucockulous interpretation of the Old Testament that makes me want to grab every Christian evangelical by the neck and shake them till their brains kick in. Which makes me think of my friend Matt, a boy I had a crush on in high school, who’s now a corporate attorney in Houston; Matt, who’s tracked me down on the Internet and we’ve taken to flaming each other about politics by e-mail; how recently he sent me his beautiful family’s Christmas card, and honestly they don’t look evil, and Matt says he’d rather choose whom to help with his money than have it flushed on social programs that clearly don’t work. And while he doesn’t convince me, I grudgingly acknowledge this point of view and concede that not all Republicans, even tax attorneys in Texas, are necessarily Earth-raping titans with $7,000 shower curtains, that they may have actual convictions, holding them as dearly as I do my own. So finally, I tell Jude we might STRONGLY DISAGREE with people’s opinions, but we try to love the people themselves. Then I tell him briefly about a guy named Gandhi and another guy named Martin Luther King and how the progressive mind always triumphs in the end, and he’s maybe paying attention, though he’s tricky that way and glazes over often, as you can imagine.

But he’s satisfied for the moment, squinting through the foggy car window, and I feel better as it’s morning, with the sun just poking up over the canopied road as we drive quietly through our tidy neighborhood of houses with doorway flags promoting pineapples and football teams and whatever else my neighbors feel the need to advertise, and I’m thinking maybe I got it right this time, maybe I did okay at least; this doesn’t have to be the thing Jude talks about someday in therapy.

But with kids, you never know, as our present is busy becoming their future, every minute, every day.

while they’re working as hard as they can to perfect the obstinate and beautiful mystery that every soul ends up being to every other.
About the Authors

Erin Belieu is the author of four books of poetry: Infanta (1995), selected by Hayden Carruth for the National Poetry Series; One Above, One Below (2000); Black Box (2006), a finalist for the Los Angeles Times Book Prize; and Slant Six (2014). Belieu co-edited, with Susan Aizenberg, the volume The Extraordinary Tide: New Poetry by American Women (2001). With poet Cate Marvin, Belieu co-founded and co-directs VIDA: Women in the Literary Arts, an organization that seeks to “explore critical and cultural perceptions of writing by women” in contemporary culture.

‘Poem of Philosophical and Parental Conundrums Written In An Election Year’ was first published in Slant Six.

Ian Birchall is a longstanding socialist historian and translator.

Becky Cherriman is a writer, workshop leader and performer based in Leeds. Published by Mslexia, New Walk, Envoi, Well Versed and Bloodaxe, she was resident poet for Morley Literature Festival in 2013. Her latest collaboration is Haunt, an Imove commission working with people experiencing homelessness in Harrogate. Cinnamon Press will publish her first poetry collection in 2016.

‘Austerity’ first appeared in The Morning Star.

Natalie Chin (b. 1992) grew up in Singapore and lives in London. She is the Literary Editor of Galavant Magazine. Her writing has been published in The Quietus, Ellipsis Journal and Living In The Future. She is online at http://herbonestructure.com.

Josephine Corcoran’s pamphlet ‘The Misplaced House’ is published by tall-lighthouse. She is online at josephinecorcoran.wordpress.com and is editor at And Other Poems.

Alec Finlay was born in Scotland in 1966. He is an artist, poet and publisher. He now lives and works in the North East of England. In 2002 he became the first BALTIC artist in residence. Most recently he has worked as an artist in residence at Yorkshire Sculpture Park, where he has been creating a series of art projects on themes connected with nature and contemporary culture – Avant-Garde English Landscape. He set up the Morning Star small press, which publishes the Folios and the pocketbooks series. Recent books include Turning Toward Living (Platform Projects, 2004), Shared Writing, (Platform Projects, 2005), Ludwig Wittgenstein: There Where You Are Not (Blackdog, 2006), Mesostic Herbarium (Platform Projects, 2004), Wind Blown Clouds (Morning Star, 2005), Be My Reader (Bristol, Shearsman, 2012), and the pamphlet Question your Teaspoon (Calder Wood, 2012).

Iain Galbraith’s poems have appeared in the Times Literary Supplement, Poetry Review, PN Review, Edinburgh Review, New Writing and many other journals and books. A winner of the John Dryden Translation Prize and the Stephen Spender Prize for Poetry Translation he is also the editor of five poetry anthologies, while his recent translated books include a selection of W.G. Sebald’s poetry, Across the Land and the Water (2011), John Burnside’s selected poems in German, Versuch über das Licht (2011), and Jan Wagner’s Self-portrait with a Swarm of Bees (2015). He is an occasional lecturer, and in 2014-15 taught Poetics of Translation at the University of Applied Arts in Vienna. He grew up in Scotland and now lives in Germany.

Helen Ivory is a poet and assemblage/collage artist. Her fourth Bloodaxe Books collection is Waiting for Bluebeard. She edits the webzine Ink Sweat & Tears, and is Course Director and teaches for, the for the UEA/ WCN creative writing programme. A collaborative Tarot pack with the artist Tom de Freston is forthcoming from Gatehouse Press in Winter 2015, and a book of collage cut-up poems from Knives Forks and Spoons Press in Spring 2016.

Andy Jackson is from Salford, and now lives in Scotland. He is the editor of Anthologies Split Screen, Double Bill and Tour de Vers (Red Squirrel Press) and Whaleback City (with W.N. Herbert, Dundee University Press). His collection of poetry, The Assassination Museum, was published in 2010, also by Red Squirrel Press. Andy co-curates the New Boots and Pantisocracies poetry project with W.N. Herbert.

Erik Kennedy may live in New Zealand, but he supports people who support the people, anywhere they are. In the UK his poems have appeared in The Morning Star, Oxford Poetry, and Poems in Which. He is the poetry editor for Queen Mob’s Teahouse. He is on Twitter at @thetearooms.

The title ‘Growing Fears That the Leadership Contest Has Been Hijacked by Far-Left Infiltrators’ is a dazzlingly stupid phrase from the first sentence of a Telegraph article of 27 July, 2015 (‘Jeremy Corbyn faces coup plot if he wins Labour leadership’).

Marion McCready lives in Argyll, Scotland. Her first full-length collection is Tree Language (Eyewear Publishing, 2014).

‘The Red Road' was first published in her pamphlet.
Nicholas Murray is a poet and literary biographer based in Wales and London who has written lives of Aldous Huxley, Kafka and Bruce Chatwin. He is the author of Get Real! (Rack Press, 2011) a verse diatribe against the last coalition Government. His new poetry collection, The Secrets of the Sea is published in September by Melos Press. He is a former Labour Party activist and was assistant Secretary of Bermondsey Labour Party in the early 1980s when Peter Tatchell unsuccessfully stood for the Bermondsey Parliamentary seat. He is the winner of the 2015 Basil Bunting Prize.

Pascale Petit’s sixth collection Fauverie was shortlisted for the 2014 T. S. Eliot Prize and won the 2013 Manchester Poetry Prize. Her fifth collection What the Water Gave Me: Poems after Frida Kahlo was shortlisted for both the T. S. Eliot Prize and Wales Book of the Year, and was a Book of the Year in The Observer. Pascale has had three collections chosen as Books of the Year in the Times Literary Supplement, The Independent and The Observer. She is the recipient of a Cholmondeley Award and is chair of the judging panel for the 2015 T. S. Eliot Prize. Bloodaxe will publish her seventh collection Mama Amazonica in 2017.

‘Scarlet Macaws’ was previously published in the New Boots and Pantisocracies: 100 days of poetry for the austere generation project.

Tom Pickard’s latest book, hoyoot, collected poems and songs, was published by Carcanet in 2014. His ‘Ballad Of Jamie Allan’ published by Flood Editions (Chicago) was a finalist in the National Book Critics Circle Awards in 2008. He has written librettos and lyrics for musicians and composers. His forthcoming collection, Winter Migrants, is due from Carcanet in 2016.

Ian Pindar has published two poetry collections, Emporium and Constellations (both Carcanet). Emporium was shortlisted for The Seamus Heaney Centre for Poetry Prize for First Full Collection 2012. His poems have appeared in The Forward Book of Poetry 2011 and 2012, London Magazine, Magma, PN Review, Poetry Review, Stand and the Times Literary Supplement. He won second prize in the National Poetry Competition 2009, a supplementary prize in the Bridport Prize 2010 and was shortlisted for the 2010 Forward Poetry Prize (Best Single Poem).

Michael Rosen is a writer, broadcaster and Professor of Children's Literature at Goldsmiths, University of London. His forthcoming book of political poems is ‘Don’t Mention the Children’ (Smokestack Books, Oct 2015).

‘For Jeremy Corbyn’ first appeared at michaelrosenblog.blogspot.co.uk.
Michael Schmidt OBE FRSL is the founder and editorial and managing director of Carcanet Press Limited, the general editor of PN Review, and Professor of Poetry at the University of Glasgow. He is currently a writer in residence at St John’s College, Cambridge, and a visiting professor at the University of Bolton.

Ernest Schonfield is a writer and Lecturer in German at the University of Glasgow.

Nick Telfer is a British poet and writer at PN Review.

Rory Waterman’s Tonight the Summer’s Over (Carcanet, 2013) is a PBS Recommendation and was shortlisted for the Seamus Heaney Prize. He lectures English at Nottingham Trent University, and writes regularly for the Times Literary Supplement and other publications. He has also written two books on twentieth-century poetry, and edits New Walk, an international magazine for poetry and the arts. ‘Anderby Creek’ first appeared in The Interpreter’s House.